From Revolution newspaper:

"Hundreds of people of diverse ages, backgrounds, and political perspectives came together in one place for an evening of jazz, funk, soul, rock, theater, dance, poetry, visual arts, commentary, and film. All of it aching for, giving voice to, and infused with the possibility of a radically different world than the maddening planet we live on now. All of it unleashed by—and cohered around the occasion of the publication of BAsics, a comprehensive yet succinct new book of quotations and short essays by Bob Avakian, the Chairman of the Revolutionary Communist Party, with much of the evening's performances flowing from and a large portion of it explicitly inspired by the life and the work of Avakian."

There was a rare electricity felt in the air on April 11, and people felt for one night – in only ways this combination of the artists' work, Avakian's words, the different perspectives from the stage and the openness of the audience – what the vision of a new world might feel like.

In this intense and important political moment, this is something that has to reverberate beyond the walls of Harlem Stage. There is a widespread, if latent, desire for another world and another way. This event spoke to this, and through a film of the night, can speak to this on a much bigger level... making an impact throughout society. The conception for the film is in development but it will include footage of the inspiring performances interspersed with interviews of the artists who took part and members of the host committee.

People attending spoke to what was unique and powerful in the event... from a student: "It feels like hope. That's honestly what it feels like..." from a white woman in her 60s: "I hope this begins something because I think that for the first time of all my life that I've been on this earth. I've never felt the helplessness I feel..." from a Black woman, "my generation, unfortunately, has become quite passive, and not involved and not active... it's difficult to be part of a generation that's... lacking care and concern. But I guess it's gonna take someone like Bob Avakian to get the light under them..."

The funds raised in this initial effort will pay for beginning production costs (including equipment, the bulk of the cost for an editor) with a fuller budget for distribution and promotion costs to follow. This will be accompanied by a campaign on kickstarter as part of later fundraising efforts.
