Two Weddings... Two Dreams...

They had come to the small Iraqi desert village of Mogr el-Deeb to celebrate the wedding of Azhad Nayef and Rutbah Sabah. There was a cameraman, musicians, even a popular Baghdad wedding singer. They sang and danced until night came with its cooling darkness. It was a happy occasion.

By the next day, over 40 people lay dead in the wreckage of the wedding party. Most were women and children, killed by a U.S. airstrike and military assault on the small village. The U.S. military insisted they fired on a house of terrorist insurgents and refuse to acknowledge the murderous carnage they left in their wake. "I don't have to apologize for the conduct of my men," said Major General James Mattis, commander of the 1st Marine Division.

Sean Bell and his fiancee Nicole Paultrée, with one of their two children.

Sean Bell's friends had thrown him a bachelor party at a Queens, NYC club on the eve of his wedding to high-school sweetheart Nicole Paultrée. The couple had made plans together, maybe a move down to Atlanta with their two kids. When it came time to leave, Sean was only a few hours away from the wedding.

Sean never made it to the wedding. A block from the club, an undercover cop approached his car. Fearing a robbery or carjacking, Sean attempted to quickly drive away. He clipped the cop, backed into a store gate, and hit an unmarked police minvan. The cops unloaded at least 50 rounds into Sean's car, killing Sean and wounding his two friends. Police claimed that one of the young men had a gun in his waistband. No guns were found. To justify the murder, police now insist there was a “fourth” person with a gun—and have carried out raids and arrests of young Black men in an ongoing effort to cover up their crime.

Two Nightmares

One Criminal System

revcom.us

Graphic by Virus X Photos from AP